Allah: A Christian Response is directed at Christians—Miroslav Volf mentions John Piper by name—who believe the Bible teaches that the Muslim God is very much unlike Jesus (pp.34f.). The implication seems to be that Christians who disagree with Volf are part of the world's problems and not part of the solution:

Book Reviews: Allah: A Christian Response by Miroslav Volf. It is according to God's trustworthy nature, not according to a capricious nature. It prefigures God finally absorbing the deserved judgment and wrath on all nations in Christ's death on the cross. Judgment deserved became judgment absorbed.

Book Reviews: Allah: A Christian Response by Miroslav Volf

In Allah: A Christian Response, Miroslav Volf puts the virtues of intellectual charity and loyalty on display in grappling with the relationship between the content of Christian and Muslim belief. In doing so, Volf confronts the issue of the degree to which a charitable interpretation of Muslim belief is similar to a loyal interpretation of Christian belief.

Chrislam is Volf's political theology in this work. He does not explicitly call it so, but he clearly fleshes it out. The thesis of the book is that Allah and the God of the Bible are one and the same person. He conditions the world's peace by bringing together Christians and Muslims in the mix of Chrislam (p.8,9).

A review of the book "Allah, a Christian response"

Upon reading Miroslav Volf's article "Allah and the Trinity" (March 8), I was reminded of Athanasius's understanding of the Trinity. Athanasius compared the Trinity to a lighted candle: the lighted candle is a flame; the flame is light and the flame is heat, but it is all one flame.
