In The Garden Of North American Martyrs by Tobias Wolff, 1981. The magic trick: Writing the perfect ending. So often the stories I read for this blog don't really end, they kind of dribble out like a leaky faucet. It's as if having a twisty, turny plot that ends on a definitive point is somehow low-brow. And I understand that.

Eden Was the North Pole!--A Capsulized History of the Predeluvial World and the Science of Human Behavior. By Gene D. Matlock One day, while doing my usual research on Ancient India at a nearby university, I asked a young Hindu student I met there whether he could explain why India, the mother of all human civilizations and religions, knew so little about its own ancient history. He said that ...

"In the Garden of the North American Martyrs" is a quality collection, but alot of the writing is dry and outdated. Compared to other collections of short stories, Wolff's collection just doesn't match up. These stories were written between 1976 & 1981 and that explains alot in my opinion. Several of the stories are really dull and the topics ...

This underused iris happily grows and blooms in partial shade. Its blue-violet flowers cover the grassy clumps of foliage in late spring and make an attractive accent to rock cress (Arabis) and creeping phlox (Phlox subulata). Several varieties are available and form fast-spreading (but non-aggressive) clumps within a few seasons.
