A Fire in the Sun. There is a focus on cybernetics, landing the book squarely in the cyberpunk sci-fi genre, but the electronic gizmos are not the focus of the story. The levels of sex and drug use, and to a slightly lesser extent the violence, in these books is astounding but I don't feel it took anything away from the story. Genre: Science Fiction.

I have a Fire and I love it, but it isn't good for reading in sunlight. Turning the screen brightness up can help a little, but not if the sun is really bright. Beach or poolside reading isn't my thing, so it doesn't really bother me. Best thing might be to buy a cheap basic Kindle for holiday reading.

Reading a Kindle Fire screen in the sunshine? - Mumsnet

1 Answer. The Sun isn't "made of fire". It's made mostly of hydrogen and helium. Its heat and light come from nuclear fusion, a very different process that doesn't require oxygen. Ordinary fire is a chemical reaction; fusion merges hydrogen nuclei into helium, and produces much more energy. (Other nuclear reactions are possible.) As for rockets,...

Though pictures of the sun sure look fiery, the sun isn't on fire the way you might think, as when paper burns. When a piece of paper is set on fire with a match, the atoms (mostly carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen) in the chemical compounds in the paper combine with the molecules...

If the Sun Is on Fire | Space

If the sun was focused through a lens at a flammable part of a building it could conceivably start the building burning. Of course, it's much easier to start dry scrub on fire. The sun by itself will not cause either to catch fire. It will dry the grass out so that any spark might set it off, but that's not the sun starting a fire directly.
